Category: Islam Monday, 19 October 2010 The phone rings. Another London Underground music quiz? I'm a London Underground snob, I confess. I don't go on the tube more than once or twice a day and it is perhaps best to not think about what it would be like when you do. But I know my fares. So I get an alert text on my mobile phone that the Bakerloo Line Tube has passed the spot where I'm staying, and I know that the code I've been given will allow me to get on without paying for the fare. This is one of a series of alerts. But on this occasion there's a slight problem - the first 25 lines or so of the Tube journey go without the alert code. I don't want to panic the passengers on the line, so I just stay quiet. After an agonising 20 minutes of nothing happening, I break the silence to blurt out "Hello, it's me, can you hear me?," only to hear the reply "Oh my God, is that you? It's so good to hear your voice." I was speaking to a kind-hearted stranger called Marina. It turns out that there is a code on the Tube that alerts every single passenger on the line to your presence. Once you've been alerted, it takes three hours to be picked up by the nearest transmitter, which is out in Surrey and has a range of 400 miles. It's a good idea, of course. Marina got on the train from Waterloo a full 30 minutes early, and then while the train was still moving, she alerted everyone. Bravo, Marina. If I had one of those alerts I'd be a bit more of a twat. The interaction of the antiparkinson drug, benzotropine, with inositol trisphosphate binding sites in rat striatal membrane preparation. The actions of the anti-Parkinson drug, benzotropine, on the inositol 1,4,5-trisphosphate-evoked mobilization of inositol phosphates and inhibition of Ca<sup>2+</sup>-dependent ATP hydrolysis were studied in a rat striatal membrane preparation. The inhibition of the inositol trisphosphate induced mobilization of inositol phosphates was concentration-dependent (EC<sub>50</sub> = 8.7 X 10<sup>(-7)</sup> M) and was reversible. The benzotropine binding
