Aspirin is one of the most widely used drugs in primary and secondary prevention of cardiovascular diseases. The antithrombotic effect of acetyl-salicylic acid in patients with coronary artery disease is largely understood. Aspirin has also multiple biological activities that may contribute to its anti-cancer effect and actions. Aspirin suppresses platelet aggregation. It has been shown that aspirin inhibits the synthesis of prostaglandins and thromboxanes. This effect may inhibit tumor growth by directly inhibiting the synthesis of pro-inflammatory mediators and by inhibiting inflammatory cell migration and survival. In addition to its anti-inflammatory effects, aspirin has also been shown to inhibit cancer cell proliferation, tumor growth, and metastasis. This review summarizes the anti-cancer effects of aspirin and the underlying mechanisms including the inhibition of PGE₂, thromboxane and COX₂.Molecular and functional analysis of an 80-kb pSAK2-related element in rice. The rice blast pathogen, Magnaporthe oryzae, causes devastating epidemics in many rice-growing regions of the world. One important but underexploited component of the rice blast defence is the rice SAK2 (RGA3) gene, whose enhanced expression can delay rice blast disease, whereas the reduced expression of RGA3 can accelerate the development of the pathogen. However, little is known about the genetic basis or actual functions of RGA3. Here, we report that the RGA3 transcript is induced by rice blast infection and the elicitation of the rice defence responses. By mutational analysis of RGA3-containing genomic fragments, we showed that an 80-kb region, which we call the RGA3-responsive region, is essential for the infection- and defence-inducible expression of RGA3. The gene expression of RGA3, as well as that of OsPR10a, OsPR10b, OsPR11b, OsPR15b, OsPR4, OsPAL1, OsWRKY45, OsSIPK, OsMAPK5, OsMAPK12 and OsMAP
