"He does not give up easy. He"s always been there for me. I hope he knows that it was me and I hope he never forgets it." "He never sits there and says to me, "Well, she was always there for me and I helped her for so long,"" Wade said. "He understands," Scott said. "He understands me." Both Scott and Wade said they're grateful for the support from the Lions that has helped them through what they have been through and what they're going through now. Through Scott and Wade's help, however, public awareness of domestic violence and the importance of reporting it when it happens has been increased. The Lakota and Yankton Sioux tribe has a coalition of national and local groups dedicated to giving survivors the support and help they need to live happier, healthier, and more productive lives.
