One of the more best-in-class features in Photoshop is the ability to layer stock images. Using anything from an image website, Shutterstock and even your own sources, from magazines to books or the Internet, lets you use a library of your own and keep a diverse collection of images easily accessible. The Grid tool is now quite useful for drawing grids and guides on images. Object Layers and Color Profiles have been improved. The colors in-image are now more accurate, and the number option of editing and previewing color now also finds the absolute color more accurately. I have been using Photomatix Pro 2 and Compress Pro for Lightroom 5.2 for the last couple of years to create JPEG exports. It does a great job, although it is quite slow at times. But I didn't want to switch to a different utility as they're both excellent products. Good thing, I haven't been using Lightroom very often after the recent update as I think I'm just hearing and seeing things. I'm still running 5.2 on my Work Mac, and I am happy. :-) While I appreciate its sophistication, one of my problems with Lightroom is its tendency to use too many resources. I find that when I open some of my files the application is not responding. I have to quit and reopen it, and sometimes it will not respond for quite a while. I began using Photoshop for photo retouching a few years ago. I am still comfortable with the tool, but, perhaps, it is getting a little dated. There are changes to the appearance of the program, particularly when it comes to multiple files and image adjustments. I was able to access my images (nearly 300 of them) in a folder, and choose what to apply of the settings. Now I can see only a few selected photos, and only one at a time. I have to select photos by folder. I have found that I use the tool more in Arithmetician mode than in the Image Editor mode. Perhaps, that is the reason it is acting this way. Also, it is easy to change the view to Monitor mode, and then back to the smaller window. However, even though the tool is quite complex, I do not see any work being done. I take a photo with my digital camera, process it, and save it as a JPEG. I do not realize that Lightroom is doing anything to the selected images. Usually, after the program processes one photo, it drops back to the folder selection window. It is not until I open another file that in comes the "window" that I was seeing. In other words, it feels as if an operation is being performed, but it actually is not. I would not object to such a feature, and it would be more efficient for a memory-constrained application. A problem is that the algorithm for that might be rather complex, and not really compatible with the way I work. Compressing files to save disk space is quite simple, but not so in Photoshop. I have to deal with large files, so it would be welcome.

In the world of digital marketing, designing a logo is one of the most demanding job, but also one of the most rewarding. However, designing a logo is not completely a mundane process, more often than not, the logo that was designed was not well-adapted to fit a brand, or at least the designers had a poor expectation from the type of logo that will be needed. In this day and age, the primary benefits of a good logo design includes optimizing the branding of a brand, the most relevant and familiar image to the user, and uniquely identifying a brand from others. These are very important in today's world, where logos are crucial to separate or distinguish a brand from others. Thus, a good logo design is not only important for good branding but also for good business.
